The absence of epilepsy in children of untreated parents with focal or generalized epilepsy. The association of epilepsy with a particular gene or as an autosomal dominant trait is well known. However, there have been relatively few studies concerning the presence of epilepsy in children of parents with a positive history of epilepsy. In some families a positive family history of focal epilepsies with a genetic background is accompanied by a non-familial generalized epilepsy. Such families may be at higher risk of epilepsy in the offspring. In the current study, we examined if there is a difference in the prevalence of childhood epilepsy between children of parents with epilepsy and children of a control population. The material comprised all children born in a defined area in north-western Poland in the years 1980-1989 who had parents with or without epilepsy.

Medical histories of the children were obtained, and clinical examination was carried out. EEG and long-term video-EEG recordings were performed. A multivariate logistic regression model was applied. The study comprised 1350 children in the epilepsy group and 637 children in the control group. The frequency of epilepsy in children of parents with epilepsy was 2.12 times lower than in children of control parents (OR = 0.43; 95% CI = 0.28-0.64). The presence of one parent with epilepsy increased the risk of epilepsy in the offspring, more than 2-fold in general and up to 82157476af
